

US Domestic Politics Subgroup

The US Politics subgroup focuses its research on the American reality as reflected in the political geometry between the White House and the other institutional actors within the US political system. The research subgroup examines the full spectrum of American public policy and US national security.

Key areas of analysis include:

- The origins and foundations of the American state—specifically its political theories and the study of its polity, including the ideas articulated by the Founding Fathers and the influences that shaped them.
- Political and strategic culture, geopolitical imperatives, and the dilemmas that have emerged throughout various historical periods—manifested through strategic doctrines as well as the specific policies pursued by US Presidents.
- Mapping the internal political life of the USA through an examination of its institutions, mass media, research foundations and think tanks, as well as the film industry, sports, and the broader "star system."
- Exploring the political anthropology of the American states and the nation's political culture, framed by the motto inscribed on the U.S. national seal: e pluribus unum. In this context, the study will highlight the dominant role of public opinion—as measured through polls—in shaping policy and determining the level of public acceptance for the decisions made by each president.
- Reviewing U.S. public policy by analyzing the operational frameworks of various American presidents, culminating in a formal research study.

Coordinator:

Professor Harry Papasotiriou